묘사

Describe your home.

Well, let me tell you about my place. It's a one-bedroom apartment on the 12th floor, tucked away in a pretty quiet part of Seoul. The thing I love most is the natural light — my living room kind of glows in the afternoon. It's got an open layout, nothing fancy, but it feels really homey. I moved in about two years ago, and honestly? It's become my little sanctuary.

묘사

Tell me about your neighborhood.

My neighborhood is kind of a hidden gem, honestly. It's this little pocket of Seoul where you've got old houses and brand-new cafés mixed together. There's a small park two blocks away — that's where I unwind after work. You'll always find older folks playing chess, and kids running around. It's not flashy, but it's got character.

묘사

Describe your favorite room.

My favorite room is hands down my living room. It's where I spend most of my downtime, honestly. There's this oversized armchair by the window — I basically live in it on weekends. The walls are this soft off-white that makes the whole space feel calm. What I love most is how it just absorbs the afternoon sun. It's become the room I go to when I need to reset.

A change you made to your home recently.

A while back, I finally swapped out my old desk for a standing one. I'd been meaning to do it for ages — my back was just done. The first week was weird, not gonna lie. My legs were killing me. But by week two, I was hooked. Now I switch between sitting and standing all day, and honestly? My focus is way better. It's one of those upgrades you wish you'd done sooner.

비교 B형

Compare your current home to a place you used to live.

My current place and my first apartment are a world of difference, honestly. That first one was a basement studio, like maybe 5 pyeong total. Zero natural light, thin walls, and it always smelled kind of damp. I was just starting out, so I made peace with it. Now I'm on the 12th floor with a park view and an actual bedroom. It's not luxury by any means, but compared to that basement? Night and day.

SECTION 02 · 카페·식당

06

묘사

Your favorite café or restaurant.

There's this tiny café near my office that I'm basically in love with. It's called Morning Light — fitting name, because the place gets these amazing sunrays in the morning. The decor is super minimalist — wood tables, plants everywhere, soft jazz playing. It's cozy in a grown-up kind of way. I always get the hand-drip coffee. Slightly overpriced, honestly, but worth every penny for the vibe.

A time you had a great meal.

The best meal I had recently was on a solo Jeju trip. I stumbled onto this tiny fish shack — the kind with plastic chairs and no English menu. I just pointed at what the ajummas were eating. The grilled mackerel came out smoking hot, with this crazy-good kimchi on the side. Total hole-in-the-wall vibe, but man, it hit different. One of those meals where you just smile for no reason.

루틴

Talk about your café routine.

Sure, let me walk you through my typical café routine. The moment I walk in, I head straight to the counter and order my usual — an iced Americano, extra shot. The barista already knows me, so I don't even have to say much. Then, depending on my day, I'll grab the window seat and open my laptop, or just sink into the couch with a book. If I'm in the zone, I can stay there for three hours easily. It's kind of become the backbone of how I structure my afternoons.

Compare two restaurants you like.

I'd be happy to compare two of my go-to restaurants. Both of them serve solid Korean comfort food, which kind of makes sense — that's my weakness. They also share that no-frills, jeong vibe. That said, the differences hit you fast. The one near my apartment leans homey and slow — the kind of place you settle in. The downtown one tends to be louder, faster, more for after-work crowds. If I had to pick one, I'd go with the apartment one. It just suits how I eat these days.

A bad restaurant experience.

Alright, let me tell you about a meal that really stuck with me — for the wrong reasons. About six months ago, a friend dragged me to this trendy spot. We waited 40 minutes for a table. Then the food came out lukewarm, the staff was clearly overwhelmed, and the bill was twice what I expected. At first, I tried to roll with it. By the end of it, I was honestly just done. Looking back, it taught me one thing — hype is not a substitute for hospitality.

A recent trip you took.

Back in October, I took a solo trip to Jeju — something I'd been meaning to do for years. The first thing that hit me was how different it felt from Seoul. Slower, quieter, way more air. On day two, I rented a scooter and just cruised along the coast with no real plan. I ended up at this little fish shack right on the water. Best meal of my entire year. That's the kind of trip that stays with you.

Your best travel memory.

My best travel memory has to be a sunrise hike in Sokcho about three years ago. We started at 4 AM, which was brutal at the time. Halfway up the trail, my friend nearly bailed. But then we hit the top right as the sun came up — and the entire ridge was glowing pink. Nobody said a word for a solid two minutes. By the end of it, I'd realized travel isn't about the destination, it's about those quiet moments. Ever since then, sunrise hikes are kind of my thing.

A travel mishap you had.

Let me tell you about a trip that nearly fell apart. Two years ago, I was flying to Tokyo for the weekend. Got to the airport — passport was at home. Out of nowhere, panic hit. I just stood there kind of stunned. Then I went on instinct, jumped in a cab, somehow made it back and to a later flight. By the end of it, I'd lost half a day but kept the trip. Looking back, that's the day I started checking my passport three times before any trip.

Your dream travel destination.

My dream destination is hands down Iceland. I've been low-key obsessed with it for years. The thing is, it's not just about the landscapes. It's the idea of driving the entire ring road with no schedule, stopping wherever the light hits right. I want to see the northern lights once in my life — preferably from a hot spring, ridiculous as that sounds. It's become this almost mythical bucket-list item for me.

Compare overseas travel to domestic travel.

Overseas and domestic travel both have their own charm. Both involve unplugging from your daily routine, which kind of makes sense — that's the whole point. They also force you out of your comfort zone in different ways. That said, overseas trips tend to be more about cultural shock, while domestic ones lean into convenience and depth. The bigger difference for me is recovery time. After a flight, I'm wrecked for two days. Domestic? I'm right back. If I had to pick, I'd lean domestic these days. Just suits where I am in life.

Describe the work you do.

Alright, so — I work at a mid-sized marketing agency in Seoul. Been there about four years now. My role is basically running campaigns for lifestyle brands — think skincare, coffee, that kind of stuff. It's a mix of strategy and execution, which is exactly my sweet spot. The team is small but scrappy. We get thrown into a lot of fires, but honestly? That's where the best work happens.

What's your typical workday like?

Most workdays kick off around 9. First hour is just me, coffee, and emails — my buffer zone before the chaos starts. Then it's back-to-back meetings until lunch. Afternoons are for the actual deep work — writing briefs, reviewing creative, that kind of thing. On a good day, I log off around 6:30. On a bad day — well, let's not talk about those.

A challenge you had at work.

About a year ago, we had this huge campaign launch — the biggest one I'd ever led. Two days before launch, the client totally flipped the direction. I remember sitting at my desk at like 11pm thinking, 'yeah, this one's going to break me.' But the team rallied, we pulled an all-nighter, and somehow it all clicked. Looking back, that was the moment I realized — stress aside, I actually love this job.

A coworker you admire.

The person I probably admire most at work is our creative director, Minji. She's been doing this for over 15 years. What gets me about her is how she handles pressure. Everyone else will be losing their mind, and she's just — calm. Asks the right questions, cuts through the noise, moves on. Honestly, I've picked up a lot just from watching how she navigates rough days. She's kind of the gold standard for me.

Compare your current job to a past one.

My current job and my first job after college are a different planet, honestly. Both involved long hours, which kind of makes sense in marketing. They also share that 'figure it out as you go' energy. That said, my first job leaned heavy on grunt work — a lot of moving slides around. My current one tends to be more strategic. The bigger difference for me is autonomy. If I had to pick, I'd take the current one any day. It just fits the kind of work I want to do now.

Describe a hobby you enjoy.

My go-to hobby is actually pottery — yeah, a little random, I know. I picked it up about a year ago and got totally hooked. What I love about it is that it forces me to slow down. You can't rush the clay. It's kind of meditative, in a way. It's become my creative outlet, and honestly, it keeps me sane.

What do you usually do on weekends?

My weekends are usually pretty low-key. I'll sleep in till maybe 9, then grab coffee with a friend — that's kind of the ritual at this point. Saturday afternoons, I'll either hit the pottery studio or just binge a show at home. Nothing crazy. Sundays, I try to do one 'adulting' thing — laundry, groceries, or a big meal prep — so Monday doesn't punch me in the face.

How free time has changed over the years.

Honestly, it's pretty wild how much free time has changed. If you'd asked me about this even 10 years ago, my answer would've been completely different. Back in the day, free time meant going out — bars, late-night meals, the works. Fast forward to today, and it's a completely different world. People mostly stay in, stream stuff, order delivery. The real turning point was probably the pandemic combined with smartphones. Personally, I see this shift as mostly mixed — easier on the wallet, but I miss the spontaneity.

But on my commute? Total 180. I crank up upbeat K-pop to wake myself up. Music is kind of my emotional thermostat, if that makes sense.

What's your take on remote work?

These days, remote work has become a really hot issue here in Korea — and almost everywhere else too. I've noticed it firsthand. Just last quarter, my company shifted to hybrid permanently. There are a few reasons. For one, employees value flexibility more than ever. On top of that, companies realized output didn't actually drop. And honestly, the commute itself was the silent killer of work-life balance. Personally, I see this as mostly positive, but if we're not careful, we lose the spontaneity of in-person collaboration. Streaming vs traditional TV — which do you prefer?

I'd be happy to compare streaming with traditional TV. Both deliver entertainment, which kind of makes sense given that's the whole point. They also share that 'just put something on' instinct. That said, streaming tends to be more on-demand and bingeable, while traditional TV leans toward scheduled, communal viewing. The bigger difference for me is the rabbit-hole factor. With streaming, I can lose three hours easily. If I had to pick, I'd go streaming — but I do miss the shared 'everyone watching the same thing' moment.

AI in everyday life — your opinion?

AI has become a really hot issue here in Korea, and honestly, almost everywhere else too. I've noticed it firsthand. Just last week, three of my colleagues used AI in completely different ways — one for coding, one for emails, one literally to name a puppy. There are a few reasons. For one, these tools save real time. On top of that, companies are integrating AI at a speed no one predicted. And honestly, the fear of getting left behind plays a bigger role than people admit. Personally, I see this as mixed — accessible but at the cost of our own thinking. It's not all sunshine.

How do you deal with recycling at home?

Sure, let me walk you through how I handle recycling. Honestly, it's pretty consistent. I've got three labeled bins by the kitchen — paper, plastic, and 일반 trash. First off, I rinse out anything food-related before tossing it. Then, depending on the day, I take everything down to the building's recycling area on Tuesdays and Fridays — those are the official days. That said, food waste is its own beast. I keep it in a small frozen container until collection day so it doesn't smell. All in all, it's just become part of the rhythm of my week.

Your view on climate change.

These days, climate change has become a really hot issue. I've noticed it firsthand — just this summer, it was one of the longest, hottest on record. There are a few reasons this is escalating. For one, our energy systems still lean heavy on fossil fuels. On top of that, consumption habits haven't really shifted at the speed we need. And honestly, the fact that the consequences feel slow makes it easier to ignore. Personally, I see this as a mixed but solvable challenge. If we're not careful, we'll just keep kicking the can down the road. It's really up to us.

Family routines you keep.

My family's got a few routines we hold onto. Sundays, no matter how busy we are, we do dinner together — that's non-negotiable. Honestly, it's pretty consistent — same kitchen, same dishes, same arguments. First off, my mom cooks, my dad complains about something in the news, and I'm there mostly to listen. During winter holidays, things get a bit more elaborate. We actually cook together, which is rare. All in all, this routine is the thread that keeps us connected.

A person who shaped your career.

Let me tell you about someone who really stuck with me. About six years ago, my first manager Ben gave me the worst review of my life. At the time, I was crushed. But out of nowhere, he sat me down and walked me through every line. By the end of it, I'd realized — he wasn't tearing me down, he was building me. Looking back, that one conversation changed the way I take feedback. Ever since then, I treat hard feedback as a gift, even when it stings.

Compare childhood friends with adult friends.

I'd be happy to compare childhood friends with adult ones. Both have their own kind of depth, which kind of makes sense — friendship is friendship. They also share that 'low maintenance' quality once it's real. That said, childhood friendships tend to be more about shared history, while adult ones lean toward shared values. The bigger difference for me is the effort. Adult friendships need way more intentional effort. If I had to pick, I'd say I need both. They feed different parts of me.

[Q11] You're calling a café for a reservation. Ask three questions.

Hi, I was hoping you could help me out. I'd like to make a reservation for this Friday evening, if possible. So, three quick questions, if you don't mind. First, do you take reservations for groups of six? Got it. Second, is there a time slot still open around 7? Oh, really? Good to know. And third, do you have any outdoor seating available? My friend's got a dog with her. That's helpful, thanks. Really appreciate your help!

[Q12] Cancel that reservation and propose a solution.

Oh no, hi again. Something kind of came up — my friend actually got sick, so we have to cancel Friday night. I'm really sorry for the last-minute thing. I was wondering — would it be possible to push the reservation to next Friday same time instead? Same group, same setup, just a week later. If that doesn't work, we can totally just cancel outright and rebook later when things settle. Whatever's easier on your end.

[Q11] Calling to book a hotel — ask three questions.

Hi, I'm calling because I'd like to ask about your hotel for a weekend stay next month. I've got a few questions, if that's okay. First off, what are your standard check-in and check-out times? Got it, that makes sense. Also, is there parking available for guests, and is it included or extra? Oh, really? Complimentary parking — that's great. And one more thing — how much does a standard room cost for two nights, and are there discounts for booking through your website directly? That's helpful, thanks.

[Q12] Hotel room problem — request a solution.

Hi, I'm calling from room 1208. I ran into a bit of a problem and was hoping you could help me figure out what to do. Basically, the air conditioning isn't working at all — I checked the unit, the thermostat, everything. So here's what I was thinking. Ideally, a room change would be my first preference, since I'm here for two more nights. If that's not doable, I'd also be open to having someone fix the AC tonight. Or, if neither of those works, maybe we could work something out like a discount on the stay. Whatever works best on your end, I'm open.

[Q13] Tell me about a real-life hotel problem you handled.

Yeah, actually, I've dealt with something really similar before. It happened about a year ago. I'd booked a hotel for a wedding, and at check-in they told me my room was double-booked. At first, I was honestly stunned — that wedding was in three hours. But then, I just stayed calm and laid out three options. The manager rebooked me into a suite at the same rate, comped breakfast, and apologized. By the end of it, I'd actually upgraded my night. Ever since then, I've believed that staying calm and offering options is half the win.

Public transportation in your city.

Seoul's public transportation is honestly one of the things I'm most spoiled by. The subway hits basically everywhere, runs on time to the second, and is way cleaner than most cities I've been to. The buses are color-coded, so even tourists pick it up fast. What gets me most, though, is the integration. One T-money card and you're good across subways, buses, taxis, even some bike rentals. I've been to other cities and immediately missed it.

A time you got stuck in traffic.

Let me tell you about a traffic jam that really stuck with me. About two years ago, I was heading to my cousin's wedding. Out of nowhere, an accident shut down the highway. I was about 20 km out with 40 minutes to spare. At first, I honestly didn't know what to do. But then, I went on instinct, took the next exit and used back roads. By the end of it, I rolled in two minutes before the ceremony. Looking back, that was the day I realized GPS isn't always smarter than local instinct.

Compare modern parenting with parenting in the past.

It's pretty wild how much parenting has changed. If you'd asked me about this even 20 years ago, the answer would've been completely different. Back in the day, parenting leaned a lot more on routine and authority. Kids ate what was on the table, slept when told, didn't argue. Fast forward to today, and it's a completely different world. Now, parents emphasize emotional literacy, choice, autonomy. The real turning point was probably the wave of psychology research becoming mainstream. Personally, I see this as mostly positive, though kids today carry pressure of a different kind.

Healthy lifestyle trends — your take?

These days, healthy lifestyle stuff has become a really hot issue here in Korea — and almost everywhere else. I've noticed it firsthand. Just last month, three of my friends started training for half-marathons. There are a few reasons. For one, people are pushing back against burnout culture. On top of that, social media has made fitness almost performative. And honestly, the rising cost of healthcare plays a quiet role. Personally, I see this as a mixed shift. On one hand, more awareness. On the other hand, if we're not careful, health becomes another thing to compete on. It's not all sunshine.

The role of social media — your view.

Social media has become a really hot issue, and honestly, almost no conversation skips it now. I've noticed it firsthand. Just this past year, I watched two friends quit Instagram for mental health, while another built a full business off TikTok. There are a few reasons it dominates. For one, attention has become the world's most valuable currency. On top of that, the algorithms are scary good. And honestly, there's a community pull people don't talk about — it's how my generation finds each other. Personally, I see this as a true double-edged sword. Whether it shapes us thoughtfully or not is really up to us.
